

Fight SCISSORS with SCISSORS.

Get the whole story. Get [MORE].

Missing something? Perhaps you expected further follow-up on the secret bombing of Cambodia?

At [MORE], we wondered why the press dropped the Cambodian bombing story. Our reporter got this answer:

"I don't know that there's any news in it now . . . Who's going to sue President Nixon for bombing some peasants in Cambodia?"

—Clifton Daniel, Washington Bureau Chief, The New York Times

So they scissored the story. And the Times is one of the best. Newsweek's Pentagon man, Lloyd Norman, told us Cambodia wasn't "sexy enough."

That's a sample of the kind of news perspective you'll get from reading [MORE], the critical monthly review of the print and broadcast press. [MORE] gets behind the scissors and tells you what you'll never learn from the established news media, and who makes the decisions, and why, and how.

Our editors are people like Pulitzer-prize winner J. Anthony Lukas, who was with The New York Times for ten years, and Brit Hume, who found the Dita Beard ITT memo for his old boss Jack Anderson. And writing for us are some of the best reporters, writers and broadcasters in the country—people like Michael Arlen, David Halberstam, Jane Howard, Murray Kempton, Nora Ephron, Calvin Trillin, Nora Sayre, Taylor Branch, Victor Navasky, James Ridgeway, Stan Gould, and many more—who write for [MORE], despite the very modest fees we can afford, because they have things to say that they can't say anywhere else.

We're after a new freedom of the press—the freedom of every working journalist to do a livelier, more literate, more intelligent job of reporting the news—all the news. So, pit your scissors against the scissors you'll never see in newsrooms, editorial offices, and executive suites around the country. Just clip the coupon below.
